In This Chapter Understanding the proper file formats to use Understanding the relationship between a file format and the image file format Understanding the importance of color in image editing In this chapter, I show you why the RGB color model is the ideal color model for computers, I explain the relationship between a file format and the image file format, and I explain the importance of color and color space. When you edit an image, you work in two areas: the image editing program, also called the `_editing environment_` in Photoshop and the `_toolbar_` in other programs, and the image that you import and export from the editing environment into the images you need. You don't edit the files you import and export because they aren't stored in the computer as a raster image file (with the extension of a JPG, TIFF, or EPS file). Instead, they are imported or exported in a different format — RAW, a TIFF, or a PSD file, for example. I describe these file formats and explain their role in this chapter. ## Understanding the RGB Color Model The colors that you see in the world come from light — basically, various wavelengths of light. Think of light as a color wheel: There's red, yellow, green, and blue. Each color in a picture is built up of mixes of those primary colors. The mixing of the primary colors is defined by the `_color space_` and the `_color model_` that the computer is Localization of Rho A in spinal cord at ischaemic and non-ischaemic sites after experimental subarachnoid haemorrhage. Rho A has been implicated in the activation of smooth muscle and in Ca(2+)-dependent exocytosis in Purkinje neurons and is considered to play a role in the cascade of events leading to the development of cerebral vasospasm. The aim of the present study was to determine the localization of Rho A in rat spinal cord subjected to subarachnoid haemorrhage (SAH) followed by ligation of the left common carotid artery. Perfusion and storage of spinal cord sections from control rats was used as a negative control. Spinal cord sections were incubated with an antibody against Rho A. Rho A was concentrated in the subarachnoid space in the area surrounding the arachnoid granulations and in the ependyma of the central canal. In animals subjected to SAH Rho A was found in neurons of the dorsal nucleus of the ventral horn, the intermediate zone and the lateral horn. The immunostaining intensity was lower in all of these zones, but not in the ventral horn, compared with the control group. No differences in distribution and staining intensity were observed between the animals sacrificed 6, 24 or 48 h after the induction of SAH. These results indicate that Rho A is activated in neurons following subarachnoid haemorrhage. Whether this activation takes place because of exogenous signals from subarachnoid haemorrhage or is a part of an endogenous response is not known. Improvement in skin microcirculation by transcutaneous electrical nerve stimulation. The aim of the study was to investigate the effects of transcutaneous electrical nerve stimulation (TENS) on skin blood flow in healthy volunteers. On three separate occasions four different TENS frequencies were applied to the periferal skin of 30 healthy volunteers. The mean capillary blood flow at distal parts of the palm, the fingers, the dorsal part of the foot and the dorsal forearm was measured by laser Doppler flowmetry. At all locations, except for the forearm, the capillary blood flow was significantly increased when the volunteers were stimulated with TENS. The increase in the capillary blood flow at the distal parts of the hand and the foot was higher when the stimulation was applied at frequencies of 80 and 90 Hz, respectively.
